WHICH WAS MAD?

One evening in autumn, Cora Baronne de St.
Ange sat in the drawing-room of her villa at St.
Cloud, surrounded by her usual circle of friends of long years, and all accustomed to meet every evening.

Neither Mme. de St. Ange nor her friends, however, were old; and although she was a widow, Mme. de St. Ange was not a day over thirty-five, by a thousand people incapable of understanding her, and who would have forgotten her as soon as she ceased to amuse them.

She was rich and possessed of every attraction to insure her a brilliant position in society, but she was, so far as a woman be, utterly devoid of vanity. She preferred to be loved, to be respected by those around her, rather than to be admired by a thousand people incapable of understanding her, and who would have forgotten her as soon as she ceased to amuse
them.

The greater part of the year she lived at St.
Cloud, and the rest of the year at Paris. Year after year the same circle of friends drew around her, spending weeks beneath her roof.
But the circle was often enlivened by visitors from Paris, fifteen minutes of railroad being all that divided the capital from St. Cloud.

This evening Mme. de St. Ange was expecting a guest from Paris, and all were just saying, Monsieur de Montmey, will not come, when M.
de Montmey was announced.

"Do not ask me why I am here late, but rather wonder how it is that I am here at all." Why, what has happened?"

"I have been knocked down."
"Knocked down?"

"Yes, and by a woman!"

"A woman?"

"Yes, a woman, who fell from a third story window, first on my head, and then on the pavement, where she remained lying very still,
all crushed and bleeding."

"Good heavens! an accident or a suicide?"

"I know not; all I know is that when I arose I was so overpowered with horror that I was obliged to lean for support on the two people nearest me, and that nothing but a stiff gleam of bravely restored me to my senses. Then I beheld another sight that almost turned my blood."

"What could be more horrible than what you had seen?"

"When I have told you occurred, I was with a friend of mine, one of the handsomest and most fascinating men I ever knew. I looked around for him and beheld him with the bleeding, disfigured corpse in his arms, carrying it to the nearest drugstore. He laid on the counter, gazed at it for an instant, then having washed his hands, he turned to the looking glass to see that there were no stains upon him, and taking my arm, went on calmly with the conversation this accident had interrupted. He was not even a shade paler than before."

"I was a surgeon," said one of Mme. de St. Ange's guests, "could not have done this."
"And I," said General Simonet, "who have seen men on the battle field, lying dead by hundreds, could not have looked on such a sight unmoved."

"I wouldn't have done such a thing for ten thousand francs," said M. Canillac, who, being a millionaire, valued every emotion in specie.
"I should like to see your friend," said M. de St. Ange, tranquilly, "for to tell you the truth I think he is a clever humbug."

"Not at all; there was no acting, no ostentation."

"Is he young?"

"Twenty-three."

"Is he rich?"

"Very."

"Is he handsome?"

"Ladies and gentlemen," said M. de Montmey, laughing, "all questions will soon be answered, for I have asked the Count de St.
Ange, taking advantage of a general permission given me by Mme. de Baronne, to come here this evening."

"Delightful!" exclaimed the Baronne, "we will put his insensibility to a test." "And we will conquer it, I will wager any thing."

"I think not," said M. de Montmey. At this moment the servant, opening the door, announced M. le Comte de St. Ange.

Under the shadow of this name, a tall, handsome, and most distinguished looking man advanced into the room, with the easy grace of a man of the world, but without either conceit or presumption in his manner.

All were prepossessed in his favor, but all were anxious to put to proof the indifference of which they had been told.

"Mme. de St. Ange soon found an opportunity of referring to it."

"I am sorry," said one of the ladies, "that you did not see the man who was killed. He was a very handsome man, and he was very young."

"Yes, did it not make you shudder?"

"Why should it? I do not know the woman."

"All I could do was what I did to get her out of the way of public curiosity. I don't see any cause for lamentation; since this woman threw herself out of the window, she was unhappy; she is dead now, and therefore happy, and is not to be pitied. As for feeling horror at the sight of blood and broken bones, that is a vulgar notion. People are dying every day from hazards which have not one tear to give to a faceared heart, or an agony of mind that is racking the brain to madness. This I look on as foolish."

"You have an extraordinary strength of mind."

"No; but I feel only as my reason dictates."

"Is not that what the world would call selfishness?"

"Not so; for it injures all those whom otherwise we might succor or console."

"If we were a pleasure to console or to succor, I should do it, for in so doing I should satisfy myself. Ah, madame, we talk a great deal about devotion and unselfishness; there is such thing, even the strongest passion of our nature, love, is the most selfish. Love requires entire possession. Say to a man of the most generous nature, your friend cannot recover from his illness unless you give him up to another woman with whom he is in love, and she would answer, I would rather see him dead than another's."

"You do not believe in love?"

"I believe in no emotion; I believe in insensibility."

"Are you happy?"

"Perfectly."

she used every art which a Parisienne possesses indistinctly, but which until now Mme. de St.
Ange had disdained. She was prepared even to go beyond the bounds of coquetry, secure as she was in the protection of those around her.

She succeeded at last in drawing the Count into what might have been considered a flirtation. It was evening—they were on the terrace—the Count, if not tender, had at least grown poetical, and gradually Mme. de St.
Ange allowed her love to be evident, till both sunk into that silence which is love's eloquence.

Finding it a little beyond the usual limits, Mme.
de St. Ange laid her hand on her lover's shoulder, and breathed his name in low and loving accents; but there was no answer, for the Chevalier de St. Ange was fast asleep.

"My friends," exclaimed Madame de St.
Ange, entering the lighted drawing room, where all were assembled, "I have lost my wayer; I have him now in your hands—you can try your skill."

When, after a few minutes, the count entered the drawing room, apparently unconscious of the rudeness he had been guilty of, the gentlemen were at cards, and immediately proposed to count to join them.

"If it is agreeable to you; for myself it makes no difference."

"What stake?"

"Exactly what you like."

M. Canillac, who was very fond of showing off his riches, challenged the count to a game of cards, and laid on his bed; and the doctor, they played on for some time. At last Mme. de St. Ange, leaning over his shoulder, inquired whether he was losing or winning.

"I really don't know," said de St. Ange, with the utmost indifference.

"The count wins twelve thousand francs."

"Really, I am sorry." Suppose we play double or quits—eh?"

"As you please." The banker of course would not give in, but the sum was considerable, and the emotion was visible on his features. As for the count, he preserved the same smiling countenance, turning the cards carefully, almost mechanically, over.

"You have won!" exclaimed the banker, trying to hide his quivering lips.

Then we will talk of something else," said de St. Ange, calmly, and suggested his friend to play. But suddenly Gen. Simonet came forward, and taking up the cards, threw them into the count's face.

"Canillac," said the general, "you have not lost your money. The count cheats you at cards, for I have been watching him, and he has not fairly won."

"General!" exclaimed the baronne, "are you mad? Count, I beseech you keep calm."

"My dear madam, I am never anything else.
I am only sorry that some of the cards struck
you. Go to your room, and don't let me hear of it again. I have been watching him, and he has not fairly won."

"Most decidedly, and if you are insulted I am ready to give you every satisfaction."

"That means that because you have taken a fancy to call me a cheat, I must risk my life by fighting a duel with you?"

"Yes, if you please; it is perfectly indifferent to me; I leave it all in your hands; and I will retire, for I really am weary; I even believe that I went to sleep on the terrace.
Good-night to you all."

"You understand, of course, that I have
